Unlike the LIHEAP's regular crisis definition that may be brought about by an applicant's inability to meet the basic necessities of life such as food, shelter, and utilities, especially in economic circumstances that are considered beyond the applicant's ability to control, a life-threatening circumstance typically involves the vulnerable population served such as the disabled, the elderly, and those persons diagnosed with medical complications, whereby, per a doctor's script, the applicant is felt to be facing impending risk if the LIHEAP service is not provided within an 18 hour period, based on a risk-assessment. Dysfunctional or unsafe primary heating system and no secondary heating system is available. Idaho	Coeur d'Alene Tribe	To determine a crisis in our program we first evaluate the energy need of the people or persons being affected. The winters in our area can be very harsh and extensive. This can mean high energy use that can be very costly for our, mainly, very low-income households. If a household is unable to pay the minimum amount for their energy source and will indeed be without heat, this would be considered a crisis. Long winters can also mean household see high energy cost for most of the year. Even though the temperature can raise above freezing going into spring, it is still cold enough to affect any vulnerable persons, which would be considered a crisis if unable to pay. Also we experience a considerable amount of power outages due to the weather. Most people are able to stay with family (that has power) or the local tribal hotel (that has backup generators). This would be considered a crisis as the temperatures usually drop below freezing but is not exactly life-threatening since most can attain alternate temporary housing. With below freezing temperatures this can be very damaging to a home, whether it is the pipes, windows, electrical and this is when we would utilize crisis funding.	$500
